HISTORY OF THE 24-SECOND CLOCK

The 24-second clock celebrated its 50th year in 2004-05 and some folks claim it was the most important event in the history of the NBA. Danny Biasone, the deceased owner of the Syracuse Nationals, the original franchise of the Philadelphia 76ers, is credited with devising the system. He explained that he came up with the number 24 through simple arithmetic. At the time each NBA team was averaging 60 shots a game. That meant that each game averaged 120 shots. Since each NBA regulation game lasts 48 minutes or 2880 seconds, that total divided by 120 equals 24. The clock made its debut on Oct. 30, 1954, with the Rochester Royals defeating the Boston Celtics, 98-95. The change had the intended effect of eliminating the low scoring games played at a turtle-like pace and threatened to kill pro basketball as a spectator sport. With no shot clock, a team with the lead in the fourth quarter simply stalled until the clock ran down. The lowest scoring game in NBA history took place before the clock came into being. That was the Fort Wayne Pistons 19-18 victory over Minneapolis Lakers. Imagine F. Wayne outscored the Lakers 3-1 in the final quarter. So Biasone induced his associates to come watch a Syracuse exhibition game in which there was no clock but an official on the sidelines yelling out the time. "Twenty, Ten, Five, Four, Three." At this pickup game were such notables as Red Auerbach, Ned Irish, Eddie Gottlieb and Clair Bee. They were convinced and swayed the other owners to vote for the proposal and the change had its intended effect. NBA records show that the very first year of the clock (1954-1955), the scoring per game jumped from 79.5 points to 93.1.
